RESEARCH & KNOWLEDGE EXCHANGE

Brief Synopsis

My broad research area is operations research, with a focus on integer, robust and network optimization, and their applications in practice. Since my PhD thesis, I have been working on production planning and lot-sizing problems, as well as a number of integer, robust and network optimization applications, in particular large-scale transportation (such as airline scheduling/planning and vessel crew scheduling), health applications (such as radiation treatment planning and nurse rostering) and energy applications (such as offshore windfarm installation). I have also been increasingly involved in data-driven decision making and analytics applications.

TEACHING

Brief Synopsis

I have been extensively involved with teaching activities at various levels from undergraduate to Masters since I was a PhD student. I have been exposed to course development as early as the last year of my PhD studies, and I have received extensive teaching training. Due to my departmental and faculty-level administration and leadership roles, I have also been extensively involved in curriculum design. I have used my research in a number of teaching activities including online learning, and have employed a range of state-of-the-art technologies in various classes. Due to my current faculty role as Digital Education Director, my involvement in online learning has substantially increased, from content development in MOOCs and online CPD to course design and management of graduate apprenticeships.
